PARIS (Reuters) - France has announced a European arrest warrant and an extradition order against Brienne, a former French intelligence officer who is charged with treason over a second series of leaks that revealed secret documents about Muslim radicalization in France.

Brienne, who is accused of passing on names of Muslim men with suspected links to Islamic State to a third person, was caught on a live TV address in the government's economic recovery budget speech in late April. His arrest and extradition to France are the latest in a crackdown on the French intelligence community, after an investigation was opened against four current or former operatives for leaking the documents. "Thanks to the investigation we have carried out, Brienne is now being brought before the competent courts," a judicial source told Reuters.

The informant, a 37-year-old married father-of-two, was assigned to various intelligence services, ending up with the DGSI after it was formed in 2010. He was assigned to work undercover in an Algerian population and conduct an assessment of radicalization. He is accused of passing on the names of at least 20 individuals on two occasions to the third person, of which eight are currently being prosecuted for terrorism. The discovery of the first leak and the capture of the informant leading to the second episode sparked a diplomatic row between France and Algeria, with Algeria's foreign ministry summoning France's then foreign minister Laurent Fabius, accusing him of lying to parliament and to Algeria. Back in France, the affair triggered intense debates in the media and among politicians, especially because of Brienne's status as a "protected witness", a status designed to protect spies and informants. A judge on Tuesday ordered that he remain held in custody ahead of the trial. The

The present invention relates to a chuck for a machine tool for chucking a workpiece in the form of a circular flat disk, the chuck including a first part secured to a first surface of a spindle and carrying a plurality of jaws receiving the workpiece, and a second part secured to a second surface of the spindle and carrying a plurality of jaws urging against the workpiece. In a known machine of the above-outlined type (see U.S. Pat. No. 4,505,476), a chuck of that kind is mounted on the spindle in such a way that, by means of a screw connection, it can be coupled rotationally and axially relative to the spindle. By means of this screw connection, the second part is rotated by the spindle, such that the jaws of the second part are moved
