1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to an electrically variable, non-metal cutting, non-pitting hydraulic power device. More specifically, the present invention relates to an electro-hydraulic-mechanical power device for cutting an object, whether organic or inorganic, which power device provides non-metallic cutting of such organic or inorganic objects through the use of an electromechanical fluid pulse and a mechanical wiper arrangement to extend the duration of this pulse. The invention is particularly suited for the medical and dental environment, where cutting tools in the form of surgical knives, dental blades and surgical drills are routinely used to remove a patient's bone, tissue, skin and other biological materials. 2. The Prior Art In surgical procedures, it is common to remove certain portions of a patient's anatomy using a cutting implement such as a surgical knife. In many medical procedures, an ultrasonic cutting device is used to effect the cutting. The ultrasonic cutting device consists of a hand held device with a cutting tip that vibrates at ultrasonic frequencies causing the tip to vibrate at or near the skin of the patient creating frictional heat that then causes the tip to cut through the patient's skin and underlying tissue. Some disadvantages of such devices include the extreme heat generated during the surgical procedure, their bulk, expense and excessive size which limits their use. In the dental environment, the cutting tools include blades, drills, excavators and other generally known cutting implements. Where a cutting implement such as a drilling implement is used, a water driven turbine rotates the drilling implement. Typically, the water is pumped through a chamber containing a cutting tip, through a lubrication system and out of a discharge outlet. The purpose of the lubrication system is to supply sufficient fluid to the cutting tip to prevent the drill from seizing. The lubrication system may include a supply reservoir, a pump, a filtering system, and a passage for feeding the drilling implement with lubrication. Typically, the water in the discharge outlet is directed to a sump from which it can be recirculated to provide a lubricant for the drilling implement. The sump collects the water and is mounted on an elevated level with respect to the floor. The water is continually recirculated by gravity back into the cutting implement. The high volume of water flowing to the sump often carries cuttings and other debris along with it. The high volume of water has a tendency to collect debris including particles and other debris, created
