What's new:

The border they had crossed yesterday, and which they are now crossing once again, lies in the equally well-known Category 4 zone. It's an incredibly dangerous place, a jagged fist of barren mountains, that's slashed by the Chiribaya River, and surrounded by a number of smaller rivers, a number of lakes, dozens of caves, and hundreds of ancient ruins. Living in the zone for at least some time leads to the hallucinatory suspicion that one might be dreaming, and it's this suspicion that compels this group of men and women, still surprisingly young, to migrate to the border in the summer. The names of ten of the Border Class sixteen-year-olds follow here - each of these names has its own account in the book of the Outpost Nine.4 River Hall is a tall, ice-clear mountain lake, and it's there that the group sleeps in huts constructed on the gently sloping ground on the northern shore. Each hut is cramped, and they're an inelegant, battered version of the trailers the fathers brought from the other zone, two years ago, and which still serve to this day as the dining tables on the main settlement. A fire's hooked to an oil lantern in each hut. An antechamber of mattresses and blankets has been made on the floor. The first night is spent in sturdy waterproof cargo tents. It's already July, but night is still cool, and now ice-cold. In the middle of this clear rock-littered floor, candles flicker in sconces, the gray-brown tarpaper rags above them are marked with bloodstains, red bugs crawl in the light and disappear. Thumbprint moccasins - called 'mitten mittens' by the village children for the thin rubber soles that cover the feet and keep the toes from sticking to the floor - have been slipped on by a trainee and a mother, who sleep on mats stretched across each other. At night, when the community's opened fire, the dogs howl, curiously far out in the snow-covered steppe. The moon's pale, and above it there's a sky without stars, with solitary luminous patches drifting in the distance, iceskimas in the region of Courlandm and the Bublitz Pass where they lumbered, leather-clad, through
